

Whispers of Opportunity: The sign's silent call

Jenna was tired of arguing all day, as resolute as she was, she was determined to find a house in the little town where her husband had taken her to. She got in the car and slammed the door, she didn't expect Erik, her husband, to follow her but before she drove off and realized it, he was sitting in the passenger seat. He was in for the ride even though they both didn't have a direction, an idea, they really didn't know where they were going. The town was small, so they weren't going to get lost.

It was cloudy and cold even though it was mid-March, there were no leaves on the trees, the day looked sad- no signs of spring just yet but they both felt some type of hope even though for Erik it was unspoken of. The streets were small, but they felt long with the tension that had arisen in the arguments all day, better said, all week. Jenna opened her mouth to speak, she was done arguing, or so she thought that was until Erik started saying how they couldn't afford a house and that it would be costly to get another mortgage.

"We don't have money saved up and there's no one that can lend us the money for a down payment, the houses here aren't as costly as they are in Dallas but the prices on these houses are ridiculous during this pandemic, we just can't afford a house right now, Jenna" Erik carefully explained as he didn't want to hurt Jenna's feelings. Jenna then responded "We will find a house that is meant for us, God will make it happen"

Erik always wondered how Jenna was always so positive and manifested her wishes into reality. He always supported her and even though he didn't necessarily agree, he found a way to make things happen for her every time she got an idea she held onto. First, he gave her the directions to the house of an old real estate agent, the only one in that small town. The man was not there, and Erik gave up hope for the evening, however Jenna decided to keep on driving without direction, in hopes of the house of her dreams to just magically appear on the worn-out streets of that old cold town. “We are going to find the house, today” Jenna declared. Erik was unsure that would occur, especially since they had not found the old real estate agent.

However, he did recall a man that would fix up houses for a living, a handyman per say, properties that he had inherited from his dad all scattered throughout town. Erik guided Jenna to find one of those properties- he had hoped the properties would stand out from all the others. For about 20 minutes they looked for abandoned houses, worn down mainly because that is all they would possibly be able to afford, these were the types of homes the man would have up for sale anyway.

“I am done, I am tired, I no longer want to continue looking for houses. This pandemic has the market all messed up and I don't want to find a property, get excited and then not be able to submit a reasonable or competitive offer for it!” Erik exclaimed at Jenna.

Jenna kept on driving, ignoring Erik's lost of hope. Just when Jenna was about to give up too, they found a sign hidden underneath 3-foot-tall grass, overgrown and muddy. “Erik, can you go see what sign is hidden?” Jenna asked. Erik immediately jumped out of the car and there it was. A for sale sign. Jenna and Erik's face lit up, they had hope again even though the for-sale sign looked old and the ink had almost erased from it. They immediately called and sure enough, the worn-down house along with its half an acre land was for sale. Erik and Jenna finally let their frustration go and asked how much for it, truthfully expecting it to be $50,000 or more. When they heard the man though the phone, they could not believe it. Tears filled their eyes. Erik calls it the “final miracle moment” to this very day. The house and the half acre of land was for sale for $6,000 dollars. Jenna and Erik became homeowners in Dekalb, Texas that cloudy day in March. She had done it again, manifesting her idea into a reality.
